U. S. Is Too Slow With Visas For Refugees From Egypt

A warning was sounded at Paris, France, that welfare funds for support of Egyptian Jewish refugees living in Europe were running out. At the fifth annual migration conference of United Hias Service, representatives of the Joint Distribution Committee and European Jewish relief agencies, said their funds were inadequate for the continued maintenance of Jewish refugees who came to Europe following the Suez crisis of 1956.

James P. Rice, executive director of the United Hias Service, predicted that emigration of Jews from Egypt would continue, adding to the burden of the relief agencies. "It is a deteriorating situation," Mr. Rice said.

Emigration to permanent homes outside Europe is hoped to provide an ultimate solution to the refugees' plight, says the New York Times. However, most refugees seek entry to the United States

Group To Aid 54 Polish Women "Guinea Pigs" Of Nazis

There were fifty-four women at a banquet table in a Warsaw, Poland, hotel. There was some chatter, a bit of laughter, and an outsider could never have known. An outsider could never have known that these were the surviving guinea pigs of Ravensbrueck, the German concentration camp where experimentations in sterilization, amputations, bone grafting, forced infections and other grisly operations were carried out on prisoners.

An outsider could never have known, says the New York Times, unless he caught a sight of some of the jagged scars on the women's legs, or seen them limp, or heard some of the brief flashes of hysteria when some of the women talked of what they had gone through.

The women, all of them former members of the Polish underground, had come to Warsaw to hear a New York physician tell

Leader Says Bigotry Appeals In U. S. Elections Decline Sharply In Decade

Appeals to religious bigotry in national election campaigns have shown a sharp decline in the last decade, Irving M. Engel of New York, president of the American Jewish Committee, said at New Orleans, Louisiana. He declared that fair campaign practice standards developed "gradually but effectively", reports the New York Times, and recognition of religious bigotry as a "severe liability have reduced to a remarkable degree the exploitation of bigoted religious issues in election campaigning."

He termed the recent campaign "one of the cleanest we have had in years" in a statement made public in connection with a three-day meeting of the committee's national executive board at the Hotel Roosevelt. The 52-year-old Committee is a pioneer among organizations in the U.S. engaged in combating bigotry, protecting the civil religious rights of Jews, and advancing the cause of human rights everywhere.

Mr. Engel declared that the candidates of both parties on the national, state, and local levels "are increasingly aware that the use of religious bigotry in a campaign, directly or by innuendo, could very well deal a death blow to their political hopes." He added that "loose unwarranted allegations of religious bigotry made by candidates in an effort to gain political advantage have boomeranged."

The "sensitivity" of the political parties to the use of religious bigotry, he said, according to the New York Times, has made it almost impossible for "a candidate to utilize such tactics even on the most remote local level," because "in almost all cases such attempts come to the prompt attention of the national party leaders, who publicly denounce them. National political party responsibility has been developed to maintain vigilance against wildcatters of religious bigotry," he added.

As recently as in the 1952 election, he asserted, the political situation "was surcharged with a considerable amount of religious bigotry, for many months, if not a full year, prior to the national conventions." Despite vigorous forthright disavowals by all major Presidential candidates at the time, he said, professional anti-Semites "injected their wares into the campaign."

In contrast, he cited the 1956 campaign and this one as having shown a "heightened public sensitivity to unfair tactics and a strong distaste, particularly, for anti-religious exploitations."

He said that candidates throughout the country were "extremely responsive" to the prevailing public hostility to religious bigotry. He hailed efforts by many groups to build public distaste for unfair campaigning.

Dr. John Slawson, executive vice president of the Committee, discounted the value of election appeals to a minority group, says the New York Times. The average American of any religious or racial group, he said, is influenced at the polls primarily by "his outlook and interests." Such groups, he added, may be drawn together by a "broad diversity of common interests, which could include economic, religious, ethnic, cultural and other similarities of concern."

Israel To Improve The Lot Of 20,000 Returned Arabs With $11 Million Over Four Years

Moves to improve the lot of about 20,000 repatriated Arab refugees are being made by the Israeli authorities. More than £20,000,000 Israeli (about $11,200,000) has been earmarked for the program intended to rehabilitate former Arab refugees and displaced persons who have returned to Israel legally since the end of the Palestine war ten years ago.

The beneficiaries of the program, mostly repatriates under the family reunion plan dating back to 1948, are to receive land or compensation, as well as housing and easy-term loans for the acquisition of livestock and agricultural machinery, says the New York Times. The new Israeli project will leave untouched the larger problem of the estimated total of 900,000 Palestine Arab refugees, many of whom are still living in camps in Jordan, the Egyptian-held Gaza Strip, Syria and Lebanon.

The new project's success, however, not only would improve the condition of 20,000 human beings, but, Israeli officials believe, also could serve as an example of what can be done to alleviate the lot of the other refugees.

The plan announced by the Israeli Minister of Finance, Levi Eshkol, is also said to have been prompted by the desire to remove one of the grievances nursed by Israeli's Arab population — about 200,000 people constituting about 10 per cent of the total population — against the Government.

Officials in Israel say that the new plan has become possible only in view of a recent change in the attitude of the repatriated refugees, who for many years bluntly refused offers of resettlement except in the form of restitution of their former lands.

The resistance was mainly to offers of land that formerly belonged to Arab refugees now residing in neighboring Arab countries, officials, told the New York Times. The new rehabilitation plans envisage, as far as possible, the restitution of lands formerly owned by the repatriates. But alternatively they provide for compensation in the form of other land or fair monetary recompense.

As presented to the Parliamentary Finance Committee, the three-point program provides for:

The establishment of regional public committees made up of both Arab and Jewish farmers to recommend the allocation of fair compensation to be received by persons whose land was acquired by the development authority.

The pledge that for those individuals who earned their livelihood as farmers compensation will be in the form of land but as far as possible, from land that formerly belonged to them. In cases where the land given as compensation requires improvement, the Government will either carry out the work itself or else finance it.

An evaluation, when compensation for land is to be paid in cash, that will no longer be related to prices current in January, 1950, as practiced hitherto, but will be according to current prices.

The new plans in final form were approved by the Cabinet early this year. The more recent announcement revealed that they are to be implemented over a period of three to four years, says the New York Times. Ten and a half million Israeli pounds ($5,880,000) has been allocated for the construction of dwellings, loans for agricultural improvements and other forms of aid, while an additional £10,000,000 Israel ($5,600,000) has been earmarked out of the ordinary budget for expenditure under the land acquisition law.

Yeshiva U. Receives Major Gifts Total Of $1 Million

Gifts of $1,000,000 to Yeshiva University were announced in New York at the annual Charter Day dinner in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. The dinner also marked Dr. Samuel Belkin's fifteenth year as president of the institution. Yeshiva was granted university status by the New York State Board of Regents in 1945.

Senator Wayne L. Morse, of Oregon, received the university's annual Charter Day Award, a bronze plaque. He was cited for "outstanding leadership and forceful advocacy of our democratic tradition."

The largest of the gifts was $500,000 from the Sadie Danciger estate, says the New York Times. One-half of this amount will go to Yeshiva's Albert Einstein College of Medicine. The rest will establish the Joseph and Sadie Danciger Professorship at the Graduate School of Education.

Other major gifts were from: Walter D. Florscheimer, senior partner in the brokerage firm of Sutro Brothers & Co.; Stanley R. Broff, national chairman of Yeshiva Ambassadors, a new group of contributors to the university; Leo Perlman, New York investment banker; and Isidore Lipschutz, New York diamond merchant.

Messages paying tribute to Dr. Belkin's service were received from President Eisenhower; Vice-President Richard M. Nixon; Adlai E. Stevenson, and other political and educational leaders.

Enrolled at the dinner were 250 "ambassadors" who pledged minimum contributions of $1,000 annually to the university. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt was inducted as an honorary ambassador. At a reception prior to the dinner, Dr. Benjamin Fine was inducted as dean of the university's Graduate School of Education. Dr. Belkin presided at this ceremony. The school was established last year with the aid of a $500,000 grant from the Ford Foundation's Fund for the Advancement of Education, says the New York Times. Dr. Fine was formerly education editor of The New York Times.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF JEWISH COMMUNITY SERVICES

the social welfare agencies of Israel and America, but there is a common need to develop more perfect liaison between government and voluntary agencies, so that the whole needs of the community are met. Here I believe Israel has something to teach us.

Recently I was called upon by a Polish couple — hard-core refugees — who after five years of care by the Jewish Family Service bureau were turned over to the county agencies. The difference in standards of care was sharp enough to create a trauma for this couple, already shocked by the worst adversities that man's inhumanity could inflict upon a fellow man.

The Jewish social worker admitted that it was a very great hardship for this couple to adjust to the inadequate relief of Cook County. There was no inclination on her part, or as far as I could determine, on the part of the agency she represented, to take any direct responsibility for raising the community standards.

Here, I believe, we have a responsibility not merely as citizens, but as Jewish citizens. This is the prophetic role of Israel — to be a troubler to the conscience until men have the dignity and security by right which now they have in measure by the sufferance of charity. The prophet, you say, has thrown his mantle on the shoulder of the Rabbi and it is for him to agitate and stir his people to work for social reform. But I must perforce share a good portion of that mantle with you, the social workers, since so many of our laymen claim that charity is their religion.

Both Rabbis and social workers have been too long selling indulgences instead of doing our proper work. For a good contribution to the Synagogue, we have often permitted our congregants to satisfy their conscience and be at ease in Zion. For a 10 per cent increase in their last year's contribution, the social workers have too often relieved the givers of any further obligation to the community. We have been selling both religion and philanthropy (in the true sense of Zedakah) short.

In our concern to protect our institutions, the vested rights of our respective properties, we have compromised our essential purpose. It was the genius of the prophet that he was willing to take the oceanic leap, that losing by which he found himself. And in that sublimation he established new rootage for his ideals.

Historians now readily see that when the Temple and its heirarchial sacrificial system was broken up and its ideals found hospitality in the informal Synagogue, Judaism found a road to survival. It may be that the sublimation of much of our private agency work into the larger social welfare agencies of the community will not only raise the level of the community, but will establish a much more congenial soil for the preservation of Jewish values.

The gentle cynic Koheleth reminded us that there is a time to gather stones together and a time to scatter, a time to bind and a time to loose. Just as it becomes necessary at this historic moment to secure the particularity of Israel through the establishment of the State of Israel, so at the very same time does it become necessary to assure the universality of Judaism by sending its leavening spirit into the body politic.

If this appears inconsistent, life is inconsistent. To see life steadily and to see it whole requires that one and the same person, at one and the same time, must fulfill what appear on the surface as contradictory or ambivalent roles. Let us find comfort in the Saying of the Fathers: that these and those also are the words of the living God.

(Additional Montreal Meetings on Pages Four and Eleven).

●Sixty-one representatives from Halifax to Vancouver attended the Ottawa conference which was convened by Samuel Bronfman, national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and Lawrence Freiman, national president of the Zionist Organization of Canada, on behalf of the Joint Fund Raising Committee of the United Israel Appeal and the Canadian Jewish Congress-United Jewish Relief Agencies. In a joint statement these officials announced that: "This conference of leaders representing all Canadian Jewry's major and minor communities is called to alert them, and through them their towns and cities, to the dangers and problems confronting Israel and to the need for re-invigoration of community strength across Canada so that we may cope with these problems in the same degree that they have grown more complex and more urgent." Mrs. Golda Meir, Israel's Minister of Foreign Affairs, who reported to the Conference, spoke of the partnership between Israel and Jewry in all parts of the world. She explained Israel's position with regard to immigration, stating that Israel has taken in more refugees during the past ten years than the total number of Arab refugees still in camps along her borders, and that Israel had settled them and helped them become productive and useful citizens. Mrs. Meir also spoke of the development of the country, and of the need for security of Israel's borders. She made special reference to the fact that Canadian Jewry has always been in the forefront in the life-saving program of partnership with Israel through financial assistance. Saul Hayes, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, reported on the European and North African situation as it had emerged at the German Claims Conference and Conference of World Jewish Organizations held recently in London, England, which he and Monroe Abbey, chairman of the national executive committee of the Congress attended as delegates. Mr. Hayes said that a great deal of attention was paid to the current immigration to Israel of Rumanian refugees, and to the resumption of immigration from Poland, as well as to ways and means of convincing the Moroccan authorities to permit the 6,000 Jews who have received their exit permits, but who are still being detained, to leave the country. This resolution was passed unanimously: "that a National Council for Fund-Raising be created and that all present at the Ottawa conference, representing their communities, should be co-opted as members of the National Council, also those invited who could not come to the meeting and those representatives whom the Council thinks should be co-opted; that the National Council should co-opt S. Bronfman and L. Freiman as co-chairmen as individuals; and that under their leadership, an inner executive be created." A mid-winter conference will be held.

TORONTO MARRIAGES

GOLDMAN-KREIDSTEIN

The marriage of Miss Rona Kreidstein, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Saul Kreidstein, 108 Delaware Avenue, to Allan Goldman, son of Mr. and Mrs. John J. Goldman, 680 Eglinton Avenue West, took place at King David Room of the Town House, on Sunday, October 12, at six o'clock, with Rabbi David Monson officiating, assisted by Cantor Abraham Wantroff. The bride was given in marriage by her father. Her full-length gown of white peau de soie was made with a scooped neckline embroidered with lace applique; long sleeves, and a full skirt, appliqued in beaded lace and finishing in a chapel train. Her elbow-length veil was draped to a pearl-beaded crown and she carried white roses with satin streamers. Mrs. I. Schor, aunt of the bride, of New York, was matron of honour. Attired in a blue chiffon gown, with sequins inter-woven through the bodice, she had a matching net stole and feathered head-piece, and carried a cascade bouquet of pink and white roses. Miss Sharon Goldman, sister of the groom, as maid of honour, wore a pink organza gown, with a scooped neckline, puffed sleeves, and a full skirt. She had a matching feathered head-piece and carried white and pink Tea roses. Sharon and Darlene Freedman, cousins of the groom, were flower girls. Each wore a dress of blue organza, with puffed sleeves and bouffant skirts and carried bouquets of pink and white Tea roses. Irving Kreidstein, brother of the bride, was best man. The ushers were: Irving Knopman, cousin of the groom; Emil Bienatock, Edward Fromm, and Bernard Baum. White chrysanthemums banked the altar and adorned the canopy. For the reception music was provided by Murray Alter and his orchestra. Mrs. Goldman, mother of the groom, wore a royal-blue peau de soie gown, fashioned with a sweetheart neckline, three-quarter-length sleeves, and a sheath skirt which flared in the back; with a matching feathered head-piece; and a wrist bouquet of gold-coloured roses. Mr. and Mrs. Allan Goldman, motored to the Nevele Country Club, in the Catskill Mountains of New York, the bride travelling in a moss-green suit, with a mink collar; and had a brown hat. BIRTHS

Born, to Mr. and Mrs. Harry Smith (nee Betty Sherman), 650 Briar Hill Avenue, on October 18, at Toronto General Hospital, a daughter, Marna Louise; granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Sherman, 42 Ridge Hill Drive; and of Mrs. Pearl Smith, 67 Lynn Haven Road.

J. D. C. Malben Gives Newly-Weds A New Start In Life

Tense and excited, the bride and groom took their vows, received the Rabbi's blessing, and then hurried gaily off to inspect their new apartment. The Nathanya Rabbi had seen many unusual sights in his time but even he was astonished by the lively pair. For the bride was a blushing 68, the groom a handsome 68, and both were former residents of a home for the aged maintained by Malben, the Joint Distribution Committee program in Israel which takes care of aged, handicapped, and sick immigrants with United Jewish Appeal funds.

Eight years ago the bridegroom had arrived in Israel, a victim of tuberculosis. His wife, children, and relatives had perished in the Nazi death-chambers. His means of livelihood, a thriving butcher shop, had been destroyed. Abraham K. was 60 then, broken in health and in spirit. But after years of patient healing in a Malben hospital for tubercular new immigrants and later in a Malben home for post-TB aged, Abraham began to put on weight. And amazingly he gained the healthy look of a man in his fifties. He learned a new trade, house-painting, and was soon able to work and support himself. Carola, his bride, had suffered from loneliness and depression since the death of her husband. Abraham's lively and jocular spirit was just the tonic she needed.

When the couple decided to get married, they applied for a room in Pardessia, the Malben old-age home where Carola lived. "There we planned to live out our lives," Abraham said. But Malben, the Nathanya municipality and the National Insurance Institute pooled their resources and instead set the newlyweds up in a completely furnished apartment in a new housing project. Abraham was provided with paints, brushes, and even ladders, the tools of his new trade; Carola was given a sewing machine, she is a capable dressmaker in her own right. Of course, they need work only to supplement their basic income which is provided through Israel's national old age insurance.

"This is a new start in life," Abraham said after he slipped the gold ring on the finger of his bride. And Carola, smartly dressed in a black and white silk dress, told her two bridesmaids, with whom she had shared a room in the Malben home, that "good coffee will always greet you in our new apartment." The new couple will not be lonely in their independence, for another five aged couples, former Malben residents now living in nearby apartment blocks, promised to help them settle down. Carola was excited about the prospect of shopping for food and cooking once again, "even though we may not eat chicken as often as we used to at Pardessia."

After the wedding ceremony the newlyweds were the guests of honor at a garden party. Then Abraham and Carola returned to their new home. There was no painting for the husband to do, for all was fresh and clean. So he went out into the yard to make friends with the children on the block, while Carola installed herself in the kitchen, her own kitchen.

U. S. IS TOO SLOW WITH VISAS and migration officials are disturbed by the delays encountered in obtaining entrance visas for them.

According to figures provided by the United Hias Service, a United States Jewish voluntary agency with a worldwide migration program, about 1,600 of the Egyptian Jews are still in France, Italy, Britain, and Greece. Most of them are unemployed.

United States legislation providing for the admission of such refugees was enacted by Congress last year. Welfare agencies represented at Paris say that administrative apparatus functions too slowly, although the scope of the immigration program is considered adequate.

them that there was a group of Americans who wanted to do something to show that the Ravensbrueck guinea pigs had not been forgotten.

Dr. William Hitzig, police surgeon of the New York Police Department, and a prominent specialist in internal medicine, came to Poland sent by an American committee that had flown some of the victims of the Hiroshima atomic explosion to New York for treatment. There is no definite commitment at the moment as to what can or will be done for the Ravensbrueck women.

The Responsibility Of Jewish Community Services For Preservation Of Jewish Values

Address to the National Conference of Jewish Communal Service in Chicago

BY JACOB J. WEINSTEIN, RABBI OF K.A.M. TEMPLE, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

It is fair to say that the majority of workers in the Jewish communal field recognize their obligation toward the preservation of Jewish values. The question is, of course, what values; and, having agreed on values, what techniques to preserve them?

I am a member of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. My Congregation belongs to the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the Reform wing of Judaism. I am free, therefore, to determine these values for myself; having due regard, of course, to the tradition from which Liberal Judaism grew and the nature of the people which this tradition is to serve.

I place first in my system of values the faith, the religion of Judaism. It is this faith which has sustained the Jewish people, enabled them to bear their troubles, saved them from assimilation to the surrounding more powerful cultures and given them a raison d'etre for continuing as a people. The attempts to extract the culture or the peoplehood from the religion have succeeded only in producing a desiccated literature and a brittle nationalism.

The Russian Communist experiment, in bowdlerizing religious terms from the writings of Sholem Aleichem, Mendele Mocher Sefforim and Yehudah Leib Peretz, revealed the utter artificiality and distortion of this effort. Thoughtful Israeli — including Prime Minister Ben-Guiron — now recognize that Israel will fulfill its destiny only as it undertakes in modern terms the prophetic role of Messianic salvation for mankind.

It is not necessary for social workers to wait on harmonious agreement between the various denominations in Judaism. Social workers should identify themselves with that phase of Judaism which is most congenial to them and work through the democratic processes of the Synagogue to bring its practice nearer to their hearts' desire.

Personal identification through membership is important, not only for whatever spiritual satisfaction the worker may obtain through this identification but as a gesture of recognition of the source and original sponsor of the very agency he serves. Practically all forms of social welfare service were originally centered in the Synagogue, the overall service agency of the Kehillah. True piety, Santayana reminded us, is a sense of reverence for the sources of our being.

There are, of course, many professional ways in which social workers in Jewish agencies can support the values of Judaism. They can observe the religious calendar in the day to day running of their offices; and they should lean backwards in respecting the scruples of the Orthodox, for the more liberal among us can be much more flexible in what we consider a matter of folkways than the Orthodox can be in what they consider a matter of principle.

This may appear like beating a dead horse, since this has been generally accepted as a rule of procedure. I know, however, that in this very city, Chicago, it is still difficult for an observant Jew to get kosher meals in one of our hospitals and the issue sometimes arises where the observant parents must use overt influence to keep their son the full eight days so that circumcision can be performed on the 8th day.

I have attended Federation and C.J.A. sponsored affairs where invocations and benedictions were cavalierly omitted and when included, often given "a bum's rush" — something to get over with and get down to the solid business of the meeting.

While religion is the most important contribution of Jewish civilization, it is not an entity in itself. It comes embedded in a culture. As the culture becomes rootless and dessicated without the religion, the religion becomes stark and dogmatic without the culture.

It is agreed that the educational apparatus of the Synagogue is no longer adequate to properly teach that culture even to the affiliated, let alone the unaffiliated. This is the function of Jewish Education and the agencies it has developed in the past half century.

Surely it would be unfair to load the Jewish communal services with the responsibility that still belongs to parents to give their children a love, through the power of example, for Jewish learning; and it would be unfair to free the Synagogues from responsibility for the inadequacies of their organized instruction; and so, too, it is necessary to place upon professional Jewish education some share of responsibility for the lack of imagination and creativeness which has characterized so much of Jewish education?

But Jewish education is still a stepchild in the Jewish community. Too few Jewish communal workers have exerted their influence on those who have the keeping and the allocating of the communal funds to see that Jewish education gets a first priority.

We think nothing of asking large sums for pilot plants for emotionally disturbed children, for elaborate psychosomatic research, for the chronically ill and the aged. We have yet to ask for anything like similar sums for enlisting and training Jewish teachers, for the development of proper curricular material, for the establishment of camp institutes, youth institutes and regional adult education facilities somewhat along the line of Great Books seminars and the Catholic retreats.

We give priority to all those agencies that preserve the bodies of our people — agencies that are often duplicated in the non-Jewish community. We support research for every disease from which Jews have died. We have adopted and given semicha — ordination — to cancer, cerebral palsy, muscular dystrophy, rheumatic fever, asthma, nephrosis, leukemia, etc., etc.

I remember a dear old lady who greeted the late Rabbi Solomon Goldman, just after he had made a fervid appeal for Hebrew education, for support of Histadrut Ivrith, "Dr. Goldman, you were very eloquent and I enjoyed hearing you, but the first place in my heart I still give to consumption." No one can, in his right mind, deprecate the value of this kind of research. But one can ask where does the first loyalty of the Jewish community lie?

If we do not collect money for research in these various ailments, that research will still be carried on. But if we do not support the agencies of Jewish education, those agencies will cease to be. We may add a little bit to the survival potential of afflicted people by the support of research agencies, but we will surely strengthen the survival potential of the Jewish people by creating adequate educational opportunities in our communities.

It has not been my privilege to serve on an allocation committee, as I do not speak from first-hand knowledge. I have, however, appeared before them quite often and I have spoken informally to men who have been on such committees. I have rarely found in them a value system of priorities.

They operated largely on the basis of past performances and on the pressures of local groups and big givers. I have rarely heard them ask themselves, "What is my obligation as a self-accepting Jew, interested in the survival of Jewish values and the Jewish community, to this array of demands on the resources of my community?"

A viable culture and a viable religion must have a local habitation and a name. The living nexus of this religious culture of Judaism is the Jewish people. I believe, therefore, that the communal services have an obligation to the peoplehood of Israel.

Anyone who works in the Jewish community knows that for every Jew who is consciously a disciple of the religion of Judaism and for every Jew who is at home in the culture of Israel, there are at least four who are Jews because they are Jews, because they have not separated themselves from the community, because they recognize their obligation to their fellow Jews. This is the blunt, stubborn fact that rebuts the comparative religionists and anthropologists and sociologists, who talk about the inevitable sublimation of minority groups in the cross fertilization of peoples in the acculturation process.

This stubborn fact rebuts the mammoth historians like Chamberlain, Spengler and Toynbee, who, each in his various way, has described the Jew to be a catalyst in alien media, destined to dissolve himself in the process of evoking responses from the host culture. When we have failed to disappear according to their fiat, they have attributed that failure to freak petrifactions in the acculturation process or to some malign, cosmic need to have a perpetual witness of human perfidy on the earth.

We know better. We know that behind the peculiar interplay of historic processes have been the deep devotion to family purity, the mutual aid factors of our community experience, and our sense of mission as God's peculiar priest people.

This sense of peoplehood has, thanks to the pressures of a hostile majority, been almost an unconscious — surely an automatic — response to challenge, a survival mechanism. It has largely been in the few periods of enlightment and cultural cooperation that we have had to be consciously concerned with the preservation of our identity as a people.

The establishment of the State of Israel is a remarkable confluence of two major streams in our venerable history, the hunger for survival against forces of destruction and the affirmative will to create an environment most congenial to the unique needs of our being. Jewish communal service has certainly recognized the machtasyl aspect of the State of Israel and has therefore contributed to the security of that segment of our people who have found refuge there. But we have a further obligation: that one described by Achad Haam as the two-way passage of cultural interplay between Eretz and Diaspora.

Communal service leaders here must be willing to share their techniques and know-how with the young, new State. There must be increased willingness on the part of our agencies to lend-lease personnel to the orphanages, the old people's homes, the youth centers, the family service agencies in Israel. I think in this respect the record of your various bodies is rather good.

Perhaps the stage will soon be reached when we can benefit from applying some of the insights and practices, let us say, of Hadassah's youth work and Kupat Cholim's medical welfare program here. You have long been struggling with the difficult technique of not letting charity pauperize your clients. You know how important it is to preserve the dignity of the personality of those who need our communal assistance. Our own tradition made it incumbent upon one receiving charity to give a tithe to those who might be in greater need. Even though the tremendous burden of absorbing a million Jews in ten short years in the face of war and boycott has placed Israel on the receiving end of this two-way passage, there are some areas of social work wherein Israel is able to give and you would be doing a great mitzvah in graciously receiving.

Once we could overcome the unfortunate stance which American largesse has given us — we might learn very much from such a two-way exchange. The concept of Zedakah in Israel is better described as social justice than as charity. In that sense Israel is closer to the original Biblical concept of that word. In the Western world, where the Jew grew to comfort, if not affluence, in the free enterprise, capitalist economy, Zedakah became more and more reduced to charity.

The growth of the social welfare state in modern democracies brings us constantly face to face with the problem of deciding the areas of relationship between the proper obligation of the private charities and the proper responsibility of the state. The dangers of bureaucracy — horribly exemplified by the totalitarian governments — have made us wary of entrusting too much responsibility for individual and family welfare to the bureaucracies of municipal, state and federal government.

And still we know that even if our Jews were twice as generous in their giving for local needs, we would still be unable to provide that floor of security which we believe is the human right of every citizen. We have thought that by developing high standards of social welfare among our own we would be creating standards to which the larger community would come by a kind of osmosis, or capillary attraction.

The fact is that it does not work that way. It becomes necessary to agitate, to take political action, to arouse the community to establish the proper standards of public welfare.

The Israeli social worker, whose concept of Zedakah is social justice and who works in a commonwealth that makes no hard and fast distinctions between governmental and private assistance, feels that it is part of his obligation as a social worker to see that the municipal council, or the Kenneset be made aware of the government's responsibility to the individual.

Now there are differences in tradition and structure between
